

Nothing to fear when you 'come out of the dungeon'

It's time to praise the University for its liberal acceptance of all sexual deviants. Not only does the University openly recognize homosexual organizations and activities, but I have recently discovered that it also accepts my form of sexual preference — sado-masochism.

Before the gays of Virginia "came out of the closet," I was quite fearful of revealing my sexual desires. But with the improvement of the gays' condition my own courage grew until I finally had the guts to "come out of the dungeon." Little did I realize the great reaction I would receive after my confession.

I first told my best friend, Edgar. His reaction was extremely mature and encouraging: he punched my face until it bled. I orgasmed! This unexpected sympathy that Edgar showed me gave me the strength to tell others. Within a few days, I had told all my friends and received the same response. By the end of the week, I was bruised, battered, and the most sexually satisfied I had ever been!

To ensure that this trend continues, I am officially pronouncing April 9 Sado-Masochism Recognition Day. Anyone who accepts us as we are will demonstrate their support by brushing their teeth or using deodorant. Let my story be an example to others; there's nothing to fear in "coming out of the dungeon."
